Most people lose something (1) time to time, and the most common place (2) people lose things seems to be on public transport systems. (3) rainy days, after several days of dry weather, there are usually a lot of umbrellas left in trains and buses. These lost articles are troublesome for the transport operators, who must keep them until they are claimed or until they can legally be disposed of. In England nowadays it is also a worry that parcels or cases which have been left in buses and trains may be bombs (4) by terrorists.

Harry White had lost his umbrellas several times and his wife had complained to him about it; therefore, he did not say anything to her when he lost the umbrella which he had bought a few weeks (5). Instead, he decided to go to the lost property office and inquire whether his umbrella had been found.

He described his umbrella to the attendant at the office, but since a lot of similar umbrellas had been handed in on the day when he had lost his, (6) [① to tell which of ② it was difficult ③ them was Harry's ④ for the attendant]. He therefore told Harry to come behind the counter and look for his umbrella himself. Harry was unable to find his own umbrella, but found his wife's, (7) had an unusual pattern and her name on the handle. He paid the attendant a fee and returned home with his wife's umbrella.

"I went to the lost property office today, dear," he said when he saw her. "What! You lost your umbrella again?" she said angrily. "I suppose you didn't find (8)?" "No, dear," he replied brightly, "but I found (9)." As he spoke he noticed that in the stand there was an umbrella that looked just like the one he was holding. His wife had bought it to replace the (10) she had lost.
